

THE TEMPLARS' GOLD

Störtebeker and his companions go ashore at Sinclair Castle. The Sinclairs learn of Maria's mysterious past and welcome her back to the family as a "lost daughter". Störtebeker and his friends are also warmly received.

Stewart, the Duke of Albany, launches a surprise attack on the castle. He presents Sinclair with the choice of either taking his side against the king or being annihilated. But Störtebeker's intervention causes his plan to fail.

Back in his castle, Stewart charges Ira with poisoning his brother, the king. A relationship reaching far back into the past exists between Ira the alchemist and Stewart.

Störtebeker is still far from the end of his search for the Templars' gold. Sinclair, not just a duke but also a Templar, needs to be drawn out of his shell. However, on behalf of the Knights Templar, he has also taken on the task of killing Störtebeker and his friends to prevent them possibly getting their hands on the treasure. In a fight to the death, he succumbs to Störtebeker, but is not, however, killed by him. He is not only grateful for this, but also impressed by the idea of a "Likedeeler empire". Sinclair brings Störtebeker to the "secret guards" and succeeds in convincing them to give up the treasure. Störtebeker is to receive one half, the other will be used for a "new Scotland".

Stewart does not only find out that the king has a legitimate son but also that Sinclair and Störtebeker want to recover the Templars' gold. If these facts are grounded in truth, then everything would be lost. He launches one final revolt against Sinclair. Can he win this battle? Will Maria finally find happiness? Can Störtebeker actually solve the puzzle of the Templar treasure?

Look forward to the exciting conclusion to our trilogy on the "TEMPLAR GOLD"
